

Contents

|                                                                                                                                                                    |     |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| A note on spelling                                                                                                                                          | 9   |
| Introduction. The Legacy of Colonial Images of British Malaya, from Past to Present                                                                         | 11  |
| I. Seeing Innocently , Seeing Innocence : The Violence of the Colonial Gaze                                                                          | 11  |
| II. On Agency and Intentionality: Reading Meaning in and into the Visuals of Empire                                                                                | 19  |
| III. Did the Sun Ever Set? Revisiting the Legacy of the Visuals of Empire Today                                                                                    | 24  |
| Chapter 1. Frozen Before the Camera: Visual Depictions of Southeast Asia and Southeast Asians from the Time of Sebastian Munster to the Era of the Postcard | 27  |
| I. That Elusive Construct Called Southeast Asia: The Genesis and Arrest of an Idea                                                                                 | 27  |
| II. So it begins: Imagining and Imaging Asia and Asians in the Works of Sebastian Munster                                                                          | 29  |
| III. From De Bry and Sons to Nieuhof to Schouten: Southeast Asia Visualized                                                                                        | 35  |
| IV. From Woodcuts to Lithographs: More Accurate, Yet Less So                                                                                                       | 47  |
| V. Frozen Before the Camera: Visual Arrest and the Endless Reproduction of Southeast Asian Stereotypes                                                             | 62  |
| Chapter 2. The Baskets They Weave: The Reproduction of the Stereotype of the Agrarian Malay in Colonial-Era Photo-Postcards                                 | 71  |
| I. Setting up the Native Other: The Performative Visuals of Empire in Colonial Malaya                                                                              | 71  |
| II. Be Still, So We May Know You: Colonial Imagery and the Social Mapping of Perak                                                                                 | 78  |
| III. Brown Skin, White Gaze: Normalized Racism in the Production of Postcards of Perak's Malays                                                                    | 85  |
| IV. The Buildings We Build, the Baskets They Weave: The Framing of the Malays of Perak as Agrarian Peasants                                                        | 88  |
| V. Arrested, and Thus Pacified: The Lazy Visualization of the Lazy Native Other in the Colonial Postcards and Photos of Perak                                      | 101 |

|                                                                                                                                              |                |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------|
| Chapter 3. Everyone, to Your Positions: ‘Racial-Ethnic’ Postcards and the Reproduction of Colonial Multiculturalism in British Malaya | 103     |
| I. Oh, Look What We Found: The ‘Discovery’ of Racial Difference and the Politics of Colonial Multiculturalism                                | 104            |
| II.a. Speaking of Generics: How Racial-Ethnic Identities in British Malaya were Visualized in Colonial-Era Postcards                         | 107            |
| II.b. Pretty Useless: The Malay Woman in Colonial Photo-Postcards                                                                            | 112            |
| II.c. Captured Power: Images of Native Elites in Colonial Photo-Postcards                                                                    | 118            |
| II.d. Coolies and Scoundrels: The Visualization of the Chinese in British Malaya                                                             | 124            |
| II.e. Laborers, Snake Charmers and Money Lenders: The Visualization of the Indians in British Malaya                                         | 131            |
| III. Behind the Visuals: The Socio-Political and Socio-Economic Realities of Life Among the Ethnic Groups in Malaya                          | 136            |
| IV. The Colonial Census and the Invention of ‘Natural’ Racial Differences                                                                    | 144            |
| V. Every Shade But White: Visuals of Racial Difference in the Service of Empire                                                              | 149            |
| Chapter 4. Forever Caught: The Legacy of the Visuals of Empire in the Postcolonial Present                                        | 157 |
| I. Sic Transit Gloria Mundi: The Photo-Postcard in the Postcolonial Present                                                                  | 157            |
| II. Picture an Up-Country Hamlet in Malaya : Setting the Stage as the Sun Set on Empire                                               | 161            |
| III. The Long Shadow of Empire: The Politics of Identity in Postcolonial Malaysia                                                            | 167            |
| IV. Kalopsia Revisited: Postcolonial Development and the Yearning for Authenticity                                                           | 170            |
| V. Romancing the Rural: Visualizing the Countryside in the Postcolonial Imaginary                                                            | 177            |
| VI. Pecunia Non Olet : Selling the Visuals of Postcolonial Malaysia                                                                   | 181            |
| VII. The Visuals That Stuck: Agency, Responsibility and the Legacy of Colonial Era Visuals from the Past to the Present                      | 185            |
| Appendix A. The promotional ads for Malaysian tourism hosted on the Tourism Malaysian YouTube channel Malaysia Truly Asia  | 191 |
| Appendix B. Complexifying and De-Orientalizing the Countryside in Alternative Malaysian Media Today                                   | 203     |
| Bibliography                                                                                                                      | 211 |
| Index                                                                                                                             | 225 |